Snagg Implant

Snagg has introduced a powerful new tool for the recovery of stolen instruments. About the size of a grain of rice, the Snagg Implant is a microchip that can be inserted into the neckblock or another solid piece of wood on the guitar. It stores information about the owner and can be read with a special scanner, which then compares the data against the information registered by the instrument owner at the time of purchase. Installation of the Snagg costs about $30, and activation involves a one-time fee of $19.95. Carvin Corp. is the first major guitar manufacturer to offer the Implant as a standard feature.
